

barróg

Vol I, Issue I:
Venues & Spaces
for Creatives

Featuring House of Hibernia,
Dublin's Finest & more

Cover photography by Julie O'Brien (@pizza_egg on Instagram)

Back cover model: April Cleary

Additional graphics by Róisín O'Donnell

Layout by Mychaela Shevlin & Ella O'Neill

barróg

Barróg is a volunteer-based digital magazine highlighting Irish culture, and documenting the art that reflects it.

Thus this publication is entirely self-funded and claims no special rights or privileges.

For queries, submissions, and complaints, find us on social media:

  barrog.mag

Or e-mail us at:

barrogmagazine@gmail.com

FROM THE EDITORS

Barróg Magazine is a digital volunteer-run magazine that aims to highlight Irish culture and document the art that reflects it. Barróg aims to identify and bring light to the issues that young artists are facing across the country today, while also uplifting the people and groups that are making art amidst these challenging circumstances. Barróg recognises the importance of community for a thriving creative scene, and in producing this magazine we hope to cultivate a place for artists to discuss their creative processes and connect with other creatives.

Our first issue addresses the dwindling number of creative spaces in Dublin. Many articles make reference to the closure of The Complex, an incident which prompted people to seriously reassess the state of creative spaces in Dublin. Dylan Dowling speaks with poet Daniel Breslin to understand how this closure has affected artists in Dublin, as well as what the experience of performing live has meant to him as a poet. In our second article, Conor Prizeman offers an alternative solution to the lack of government-funded space in the form of the underground group, The House of Hibernia. Ella O'Neill interviews Julie O'Brien, the creative director of Dublin's Finest, to hear how funding and compensation for artistic performance are vital parts of the organisation's mission, as well as discussing how changing technologies bring live performance to the forefront. Finally, Jonathan Quigley turns to the theatre scene to ask why so many groups are struggling to find affordable space in a post-pandemic Dublin.

This issue, we are delighted to have Laura Young as our featured artist. Laura discusses her creative process and the importance of space and place within her work, as well as the centrality of emotion in the creation of her art

We recognise that the work in this first issue is centralised to Dublin. We hope in future issues to provide a broader view of what artists are facing across the country, covering a varied perspective. See the end of the issue for more information on how to submit your work.

In a world increasingly mediated by digital non-places, this inaugural issue of Barróg seeks to bring us back to the real places and spaces which artists exist in today. We hope you enjoy the pieces our writers have put together.

Lots of love,
Mychaela and Ella

MEET THE TEAM FOR ISSUE #1

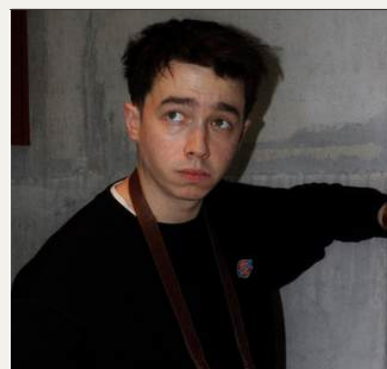

Mychaela Shevlin
Co-Founder

Ella O'Neill
Co-Founder

Dylan Dowling
Staff Writer

Conor Prizeman
Staff Writer

Jonathan Quigley
Staff Writer

Róisín O'Donnell
Artist

Oisín McGillicuddy
Web Designer

Julie O'Brien
Cover Photographer

CONTENTS

Issue Topic

VENUES CLOSURES IN DUBLIN: A STAB IN THE HEART OF DUBLIN ART PAGE 4

Music

IRELANDS DYING NIGHTLIFE: THE HOPE OF HOUSE OF HIBERNIA PAGE 8

Poetry & Literature

PERFORMING DUBLIN: AN INTERVIEW WITH JULIE O'BRIEN, CREATIVE DIRECTOR OF DUBLIN'S FINEST PAGE 12

Theatre

PAYING TO PLAY: DUBLIN'S PERCIEVED LACK OF SPACE FOR OUR PRIZED STORY TELLERS PAGE 16

Art

FEATURED ARTIST:
ART BY LAURA YOUNG PAGE 18

Credits

CONTRIBUTORS & ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS PAGE 20

Sources

INDEX PAGE 23

Submissions

HOW TO SUBMIT TO OUR NEXT ISSUE PAGE 24

VENUE CLOSURES IN DUBLIN

A STAB IN THE HEART OF DUBLIN ART

WRITTEN BY DYLAN DOWLING

PHOTO BY DYLAN DOWLING

In recent years, Dublin's art scene has been undergoing a massive issue in terms of creative spaces being shut down. In January 2026, the Dublin arts community was given the news that one of its most loved and respected venues, The Complex, was to shut its doors. This, naturally, caused uproar within the creative scene of Dublin, prompting the "#savethecomplex" petition to amass over 16,000 signatures.

Despite this, The Complex shut down on January 15th. A cultural institution for two decades, The Complex hosted events for a range of creative disciplines, including live music, art exhibitions, theatre, etc. It served as a home ground in which creatives could exhibit their crafts, something that was cherished and loved by many within the scene. The loss of The Complex sent shockwaves through the hearts of creatives all over the city, and generated anxiety surrounding the future of creative spaces.

The loss of The Complex sent shockwaves through the hearts of creatives all over the city, and generated anxiety surrounding the future of creative spaces.

The Complex, while a massive space within the Dublin creative scene, is sadly not the only venue that has shut its doors in recent years. Ormand Art Studios shut its doors in December 2025, following a lease expiration. Unit 44, a DIY experimental music venue which was based in Stoneybatter, had to close in March 2025 due to the site's sale to developers. The Tivoli Theatre, a historic theatre based in Francis Street, The Liberties, shut its doors in 2019, and was subsequently used to build apartments.

Despite claims from the Irish government that say they directly support the arts, especially with the new "Basic Income for the Arts" scheme, the fact that venues are closing at a rapid rate sends the direct opposite message. With Irish actors like Jessie Buckley, Paul Mescal and Barry Keoghan, and musicians like Fontaines D.C., Madra Salach, Kneecap and CMAT becoming internationally recognised for their art, this should suggest a healthy creative scene in Ireland. However, the situation has never been more volatile.

When asked about the importance of physical spaces for the arts, Daniel said this: “You need that, every city does. In Ireland and Dublin we have such an abundance of talent, you need spaces to showcase that and allow people to develop and find their voice, or express their talents, in the areas they are driven to, and for people who want to enjoy them to have space to do so.”

The nerves that went with that dissipated somewhat through feeling the genuine support and encouragement of others in what I was doing.”

I remember going and watching other poets perform in many different venues, and within that, finding my own desire to feel that shift from the written page to the actual human connection of a live audience.

To fully understand the weight of these closures on the Dublin creatives scene, I talked to Daniel Breslin, a Dublin-based poet who has works relating to all parts of the city.

“I am always saddened to hear of arts venues closing, as that's where culture thrives and people connect. Art, if not the heartbeat of the city, is certainly a pulse so something big is always lost in that.”

Regarding poetry, Daniel said: “having areas to gather for [poetry] and providing opportunities for new voices in a safe and welcoming area with people who know what it means to put yourself out there in that level of vulnerability is vital. I remember going and watching other poets perform in many different venues, and within that, finding my own desire to feel that shift from the written page to the actual human connection of a live audience.

When asked about any grassroots efforts trying to fill the gap of these closures, Daniel responded: “There's a lot of nights at Sin É and the International Bar, thecirclesessions etc. Nothing on the level or size of what Dublin Lingo was, which was just an amazing venture. They're out there, and people are making magic nights often if you keep an eye. I suppose it's on people to take the chance going to some nights or events they might not normally consider.

I've had some beautiful nights and some of my friends have come to open mic nights and been genuinely surprised by how much they enjoyed them."

I love this city. Dublin is a huge piece of my heart.

Finally, I asked Daniel what it meant to be a creative in Dublin, he said this: "I love this city. Dublin is a huge piece of my heart. To contribute in any way is meaningful. I am really delighted with the kind of people being a creative has brought into my life along the years, at some really difficult times in my life too. That gave me a lot when other things in life were not, and a sense of growth when other things were going in different directions. I love the people here and the people that have come here and help contribute to the arts and culture. When I think of Dublin, I always think of Phil Lynott, and one of my proudest moments in life, certainly in a creative aspect, was performing my ode to Phil in Vicar Street with his mother present and her being so supportive. That, and the people that it brought to me, made me feel connected to him and the city in a different and deeper way, which is something that is special to me. Being a creative has gifted me many special moments in life. It is a special thing to create in general and watch others blossom, but it means a lot to also contribute. I am grateful for that."

In conclusion, with less venues around the city, Dublin becomes a less vibrant and colourful space. There is a certain fondness for the arts in this city, and for such a small place, the city, and indeed the country, the creativity that has come out of here is beautiful. Dublin is nothing without its art, and certainly even less without its artists. ■

To end, a poem written by Daniel Breslin about the city, called “Dublin, Lady.”

DUBLIN, LADY

BY DANIEL BRESLIN

Dublin, you're a lady
And I'm a romantic fool

For you I'm bat shit crazy
Over my heart you run rule.

Dublin, you're a sweetheart
Your sweetness is unrivaled

Dublin, I've a deep heart
My love is set not tidal.

Dublin, girl, I breathe you
As I walk your late night streets
I still love you when I leave you
You're always in this heart beneath.

Dublin, I hold you close
As close as you've held me
In daylight walk unnoticed like a ghost
Noticing most everything eyes can see.

Dublin, you have raised me
So much we have been through
Won't you dance with me once more lady
Like we may never dance anew.

YOU CAN FIND MORE OF DANIEL BRESLIN'S POETRY ON YOUTUBE, FACEBOOK, INSTAGRAM AND AT DANIELBRESLINPOETRY.COM

IRELAND'S DYING NIGHTLIFE

THE HOPE OF HOUSE OF HIBEERNIA

WRITTEN BY CONOR PRIZEMAN

PHOTO BY @DAISYCHAINSPHOTOS
ON INSTAGRAM

As Ireland entered the new millennium, it had 522 nightlife venues. Just 26 years later, that number has dropped to a paltry 83 currently active venues. This abysmal statistic represents an 84% decrease in third spaces for nightlife in Ireland.*

84% decrease in third spaces for nightlife in Ireland.

According to industry estimates, since 2019, nightlife venues in Ireland have been closing their doors for the final time on average every 3 days, with this trend showing no sign of slowing.

In fact, according to more recent analysis of the Covid-19 pandemic, the number of nightclub venues has essentially been cut in half, as there was a 30% increase in closures during this time. The statistics mentioned above do not concern only nightclubs; they also reflect the concerning trend of pub closures across Ireland. Since 2005, more than 2,100 pubs have packed it in, which, on a macro level, tallies up to an average of 100 venue closures annually.

Similarly, aside from the numerical data, the slow decline of Ireland's nightlife has deep cultural ramifications for broader Irish society. For example, a survey conducted by Dublin City Council found that 78% of participants rated Dublin's nightlife to be worse than that of our European capital neighbours.

78% of participants rated Dublin's nightlife to be worse than that of our European capital neighbours.

The same survey highlighted people's specific snags with Ireland's currently struggling system. For example, 2/3 participants cited a lack of options in their nightlife experience. Furthermore, 16% cited poor transport links as an obstacle to their nightlife experience, and only 1/3 participants felt safe on nights out. The data demonstrates a clear desire and demand for improved, more diverse, and dynamic nightlife options in Ireland.

However, as Ireland's government, particularly in the capital city of Dublin, favours the construction of even more hotels to bolster tourism, it allows significantly-sized, well-located buildings to fall into ruin in the centre of a dereliction crisis, as well as the ever burgeoning cost of living and, of course, Ireland's historic housing crisis. With this Irish nightlife deficit in mind, an unexpected collective of heroes entered. Led by the pseudonymously named Schaymon Dreymon, The House of Hibernia was founded in the early 2020s with no official funding, no initial formal support from any heavy hitters in the events industry, and nothing else but raw passion, a yearning for a lasting nightlife community, and a longing for a proper night out.

The House of Hibernia rapidly became one of Dublin's best kept secrets in the underground music scene in Ireland. The collective organically curated, organised and hosted completely unlicensed underground events and spectacles across some of the most unexpected spots around Dublin and its surrounding counties.

The House of Hibernia's exclusive events popped up from the underpasses of Dublin's motorways, old warehouses in business parks, rural wooded beauty spots off the beaten track, and even in intimate residential spots, showcasing some of Ireland's most exciting, up-and-coming alternative, indie, R&B, soul and jazz acts such as Sell Everything, Fizzy Orange, Mt. Pyrus & Oceanna. At odds with the traditional nightlife experience in Ireland, the House of Hibernia focused on intention and building an experience for its patrons with its event organisation.

PHOTO BY @EVANCAHILL
ON INSTAGRAM

Scheymon Dreymon, commented: “We stripped everything back, there is no smoking area, no bar to queue at, it’s just the moment and the music. We focus on the moment, and if the moment is good enough, you’ll want to seize it.”

“We stripped everything back, there is no smoking area, no bar to queue at, it’s just the moment and the music. We focus on the moment, and if the moment is good enough, you’ll want to seize it.”

The House of Hibernia highlighted the soullessness of Irish nightlife in the present-day. Scheymon Dreymon particularly commented on what they believe is missing from traditional Irish nightlife: “we focus on what occupies people’s time in between the music, which is the community, so we want a space where you focus on this band for 30-40 minutes, and there you have this space where you focus on your friends and meeting new people.” From an organisational perspective, the young collective at House of Hibernia ran an impressively tight ship. Operating out of an exclusive, encrypted and invite-only group chat, the locations of these shows were typically kept under wraps until the very day of the event. The House of Hibernia used a “pay what you can” model for access to these events, which is really staying true to its founding core values. The emphasis here is on experience, memories and community, a welcome departure from the typical capitalistic and commercial model currently in place.

Keelin Coleman, a House of Hibernia crew member and award-winning multi-disciplinary artist, offered insight into her experience with the collective: “It’s just something unorthodox, and the whole energy has a different feel. One time, an event got closed down by the Garda, and even they commented how it was nice to see people come together, enjoy themselves while not causing any trouble.” Nessa Sutcliffe, a videographer and fellow crew member, described how the events are run purely on passion: “This has been operating on a loss this whole time; any money made from this just goes towards planning the next one and getting new acts, it’s all about what comes next to keep this going.”

Despite the obvious legal and ethical issues regarding official licensing, nightlife permits, and the like, The House of Hibernia existed as a peaceful, rebellious, anti-establishment emblem of new hope for Ireland’s dying nightlife.

Its identity lay in giving something back to the younger generation who have been effectively locked out of what seems to be everything: housing, stability, and now nightlife. The House of Hibernia was an unexpected ember in Ireland’s arguably dormant cultural fabric of nightlife.

With no foundation other than knowing Ireland’s nightlife is suffering and bolstered by the passion of fostering community around the music, amidst the meek and mire, The House of Hibernia looked to push back against the corporatisation of Ireland’s nightlife. They were curators, tastemakers, and carrying out their own creative coup. This independent, passionate and young collective offered the locked-out generation a place to find a lock-in. ■

PHOTO BY @EVANCAHILL
ON INSTAGRAM

PERFORMING DUBLIN

AN INTERVIEW WITH JULIE O'BRIEN,
CREATIVE DIRECTOR OF DUBLIN'S FINEST

INTERVIEW BY ELLA O'NEILL

PHOTOS BY JULIE O'BRIEN

Dublin's Finest is a music and poetry night hosted in Sin É on the last Sunday of every month and run by Julie O'Brien and Jimbo Dillon. Julie offered us her insight into Dublin's Finest, and creative spaces in Dublin.

Tell me a little bit about Dublin's Finest and how it came about in 2022. Do you think the isolation of the pandemic had an influence on your decision to found something focused on in-person connection?

Dublin's Finest was founded by Emmet O'Brien in 2022, and I came on board from the very beginning, creating the artwork and posters for the nights. It launched just as pandemic restrictions were lifting, which made the timing feel particularly significant. There was a real need for live performance again, and Emmet O'Brien making Dublin's Finest stepped directly into that energy.

What set the night apart from the outset was its commitment to paying artists. The premise was straightforward but meaningful: every performer would receive an equal share of the door fee. At a time when musicians and poets were rebuilding their livelihoods after two years without live work, a night that took fair compensation seriously felt genuinely important.

What set the night apart from the outset was its commitment to paying artists. The premise was straightforward but meaningful: every performer would receive an equal share of the door fee.

Do you think the Irish government is doing enough to provide space and funding for the arts?

There is meaningful funding available for the arts in Ireland, and that should be acknowledged. However, one of the things I value most about a night like Dublin's Finest is that artists are free to express themselves without conditions. They don't have to fit a particular mould or tailor their work to meet a specific set of criteria in order to be heard or paid.

One of the things I value most about a night like Dublin's Finest is that artists are free to express themselves without conditions. They don't have to fit a particular mould or tailor their work to meet a specific set of criteria in order to be heard or paid.

That said, I do think the process of applying for arts funding can be prohibitively inaccessible. Jimbo and I run Dublin's Finest while also holding down full-time jobs, and navigating lengthy applications and administrative requirements is genuinely difficult. Funding should be easier to access for grassroots organisers and independent artists, not just those with the time and resources to work through complex paperwork.

What do you think of the Basic Income for the Arts Scheme?

The Basic Income for the Arts Scheme is a genuinely exciting development for Irish artists, and the evidence speaks for itself. A cost-benefit analysis found that for every €1 of public funding invested in the pilot, society received €1.39 in return, with the programme generating over €100 million in social and economic benefits.

That said, I do take issue with the lottery system used to select recipients. Approximately 2,000 artists were chosen through an anonymised random sampling process and while I understand the rationale, it feels deeply unfair that access to financial stability should come down to chance. Artists shouldn't have to win a draw to be able to sustain their practice. I would like to see selection criteria based on financial need or merit, so that those who most require support are the ones who receive it.

Artists shouldn't have to win a draw to be able to sustain their practice.

With artificial intelligence gaining prominence, many people are saying that live performance is becoming one of the only "AI-proof" forms of art. What do you have to say about this? Is AI a concern for you as an artist?

AI is an ethical concern for every artist, poet, and creative working today. At its core, it appropriates people's work without consent and repurposes it and that is a serious problem that the creative community must continue to challenge. That said, I find some comfort in looking at history. The invention of the camera in the nineteenth century caused enormous anxiety among visual artists ... many feared their craft had been rendered obsolete.

Artists adapted, evolved, and found new ways to assert the irreplaceable value of human expression. I believe we will do the same.

Instead, it gave rise to entirely new movements, most notably Impressionism. Artists adapted, evolved, and found new ways to assert the irreplaceable value of human expression. I believe we will do the same. What AI cannot replicate is genuine human connection — the warmth of a room, the vulnerability of a live performance, the shared experience between an artist and their audience. Spaces like Dublin's Finest, built entirely on that connection, feel more vital now than ever.

Writers can spend their entire career not interacting with those who read their work. Dublin's Finest gives poets an audience – how have you seen this experience of performing to an audience change a poet's work/has it had any impact on your own writing?

The transformation can be remarkable. I have watched poets perform in front of a crowd for the very first time and go on to sell out venues. One moment that stays with me is a gig we hosted at Ardgillan Castle, where local poet Siedbh Lonergan performed for the first time. She had written a poetry book exploring childhood and motherhood, and the response from the audience was extraordinary. The poetry scene in Ireland right now is genuinely thriving, and it is wonderful to witness.

The poetry scene in Ireland right now is genuinely thriving, and it is wonderful to witness.

Poets like Anna D, whose Fringe Festival performance last year was truly powerful; Daragh Fleming, who appeared on the Late Late Show; Eva Mary Lucy, who will be representing Ireland at Slamovision; The Vagabond

Queen, who has performed in Paris; Heavy Kevvy; and Leon Dunne, who runs The Poetry's Dead podcast, the talent is immense, and there are so many more names worthy of mention.

You've hosted Dublin's Finest in the past with festivals such as the International Literary Festival Dublin, and at Electric Picnic. What role do you think festivals play in fostering a creative community?

Festivals are invaluable for building creative community, and Dublin has some brilliant examples. The Word Stage at Electric Picnic, curated by poet Dave Hynes, is a wonderful platform. I have also been involved with gigs organised by The Rising Tide in partnership with UNESCO and Dublin City of Literature, held at Pearse Street Library, free and accessible to everyone, which is so important when festival tickets are out of reach for many people. Beyond festivals, the open mic scene plays an equally vital role and deserves recognition. Nights like Smithfield Creatives and Circle Sessions have been incredible spaces for poets to grow, and I have made some of my most supportive friendships through those rooms.

Inclusion is something we take seriously at Dublin's Finest too. We collaborated with Blue Niall on his project "Ceomhceol" which involved people performing at Dublin's Finest who were/had lived in Direct Provision.

Ireland is producing extraordinary artists right now. My hope is that the opportunities to platform and sustain them continue to grow. It's great that spaces like Dublin's Finest give artists a space to be paid for their work but I'd love to see more and bigger opportunities.

--

Dublin's Finest will return to the International Literature Festival Dublin (ILFD) on May 24th 2026. Tickets for the event are available though the ILFD website or at this link. ■

PHOTOS BY @PIZZA_EGG
ON INSTAGRAM

PAYING TO PLAY

DUBLIN'S PERCEIVED LACK OF SPACE FOR OUR PRIZED STORYTELLERS

WRITTEN BY JONATHAN QUIGLEY

The “locked out generation” is a phrase all too familiar to the people of Ireland and specifically Dublin. A whole generation of citizens unable to afford, acquire or seek out housing due to Ireland’s ongoing housing crisis. But unfortunately, that phrase is not exclusive to housing, as Dublin theatre artists experience the pinch of uncertainty in getting rehearsal and show space for hopeful productions in a city struggling to play host to them all. So why is it that our beloved Irish performers feel they have no home in the supposed “home of the storytellers”?

“I think they’re quite limited in what they offer” is what Kenneth Hudson had to say about spaces on offer from theatres and studios. Kenneth is an actor, writer and producer from Tallaght and elaborated upon the trials and tribulations he has ventured through in trying to afford the cost of rehearsal spaces in the many productions he has been a part of. “There are studios available to rent but there are a lot of creatives in Dublin, so it’s a lot of first come first served basis,” says Kenneth. “That, coupled with the fact that a lot of the rates for rehearsal spaces can be quite high, If you’re a low budget to no budget show it can be quite hard to gather the cash to rent space.”

“If you’re a low budget to no budget show it can be quite hard to gather the cash to rent space.”

When asked about the level of work that goes into simply securing a rehearsal space, he replied “It can be about who you know, and it’s a lot of work and calling in favours to just get something on its feet”. The phrase “it can be about who you know” will resonate with any theatre practitioner reading, as that sentiment is often seen as the key to gaining your chance or opportunity in the industry, but within a city that is supposed to champion its artistic and cultural achievers it simply should not be the case. Therefore, we are left with the age-old, dumb-founded response: why? Is there a lack of actual space? That answer, annoyingly, comes with a “yes” and “no” answer. No, there is not a lack of actual space thanks to places like Rua Red, The New Theatre, the Pearse Centre, Temple Bar Studios and the Gaiety School of Acting to name a few.

PHOTO BY JONATHAN QUIGLEY

However, as noted by Kenneth, Dublin is a small city with a fantastically wide net of artists. This means that smaller companies with thread-thin budgets (if any) lose out to the bigger, well-known companies with the available resources to splash out on funding. Often, splash out they must as once the elation of securing a rehearsal space for your required 4-6 week rehearsal period passes, the cost creeps over your shoulder to level that joy.

Therein lies the next question: why does it cost so much? Well, to try and attempt to resolve that, we must look back to the big bad pandemic (as much as we like to pretend it does not exist). Theatres and spaces shut, struggled, and panicked.

So, when the greenlight was given to re-open, theatre and studio owners naturally raised the price of renting said spaces to recoup any possible losses for a period of time. However, that period had no end date and it has not ended to this date. Is it greed? Is it necessity? Do spaces feel they to not need to reduce the price when artists will always pay?

Is it greed? Is it necessity? Do spaces feel they do not need to reduce the price when artists will always pay?

We are then left with a last question: are we in crisis? No, by no means. Well, not yet. Dublin theatre is currently enjoying a purple patch of its own at the moment alongside its musical, dance and film counterparts. However, it is also in a subconscious (or conscious) state of locking out its own artists with sprawling rates and lack of sprawling space. But something's got to give, right? Otherwise, artists will do what artists do best: search for more homely shores. After all, we garnered the name as the home of the storytellers abroad for that very reason.

So, go see that friend's show, go see that struggling company's art. You never know, your ticket could help buy their next rehearsal space.

FEATURED ARTIST: LAURA YOUNG

WRITTEN BY LAURA YOUNG

My name is Laura Young, I am an artist currently studying in Dublin.

My work deals with feelings of isolation and loneliness, and the coldness of the city I feel as I am gradually being priced out.

More recently I have been exploring this idea through the lens of the pub and the cafe, the social spaces where strangers can gather in close together and experience a vast array of feelings. Where joy and celebration can exist side by side with a quiet sullen lowness.

Through my work I explore how the nuances of these individual emotions weave together to create that specific atmosphere or texture of a room with other people in it.

To make my art I like to sit in a pub or cafe, on my own but occasionally with people, and I like to draw the mug or pint I have in front of me.

ART BY LAURA YOUNG

I will do this sometimes only once or twice, other times it can be more than that, the most I've done is eleven. I'm trying to get to a place where I feel overwhelmed with a specific emotion, be it longing, loneliness, contentedness, or boredom.

Then I will go about choosing a subject in the room, sketching them into my notebook. I make an effort to only work from these drawings I have done through this process as I believe it infuses the final work with more of the original emotion this way.

The loss of the Complex was a loss to the community. We lost a vital space where art can be created, delicately held, and witnessed. When we experience art like this our relationship to ourselves and others becomes more sensitive and open.

Hollowness, when Dublin caters only to the wealthy young professional, when we have run out of places access is gained relatively cheaply.

After the closing of the Complex I felt a terrible sense of dread that the city which I love was collapsing in and swallowing itself in a death spiral of automated hotels and rent spikes.

THANK YOU

Ella O'Neill
Co-Founder

Ella O'Neill

Ella O'Neill is a writer from Dublin, and one of Barróg's co-founders. She studied English Literature at Trinity College, Dublin and has written previously for the college's University Times and TN2 Magazine. Ella's writing often explores the impacts of changing technologies on and within writing and society.

Mychaela Shevlin
Co-Founder

Mychaela Shevlin

Mychaela Shevlin is one of the co-founders of Barróg Magazine. With qualification in Sound Engineering, Digital Marketing and Media Production Management, she is now a performer and artist manager in Dublin. Mychaela works to create community and strong communication lines for artists.

Róisín O'Donnell
Artist

Róisín O'Donnell

Róisín is a tattoo apprentice from Dublin, specialising in illustrative and blackwork tattoos. She is located in Good Trouble Ink, on Middle Abbey St, Dublin.

To book or view her tattoo work, you can visit her instagram @roisintattoos.

Oisín McGillicuddy
Web Designer

Oisín McGillicuddy

Having studied Computing at NCI and now working in the industry at Advancis Global. Oisín is a professional guitarist, performing in venues such as The Workman's Club, Lost Lane, Phoenix Venue and more.

TO OUR TEAM

Dylan Dowling

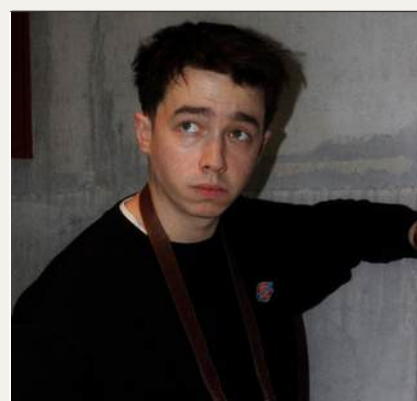

Dylan is a music journalist, sound engineer, musician, and content creator from Dublin, Ireland. A music enthusiast for most of his life, Dylan runs the page “DecentMusicToListenTo” on TikTok, Instagram, and YouTube. He is very passionate about the grassroots music scene, and strives to find the best music you haven't heard yet.

Dylan Dowling
Staff Writer

Conor Prizeman

Conor Prizeman is a writer, videographer and photographer from Dublin. With an academic background in media production management from DCU, Conor has had work featured with RTÉ, Sunday World, Evoke & Rathfarnham Castle Museum and more. Conor is passionate about various media production pursuits and plies his trade through freelance commercial content creation.

Conor Prizeman
Staff Writer

Jonathan Quigley

Jonathan Quigley is a writer, director, theatre practitioner, and voice coach from Clondalkin, Dublin. He trained in theatre for four years with ICFE and Griffith College and has directed and produced multiple theatrical productions across Dublin. Recently, he completed degrees in Journalism and Media Production Management and has been writing freelance ever since. His writing explores all things theatre and film, often with a specific focus on the happenings within the Irish industry.

Jonathan Quigley
Staff Writer

THANK YOU TO OUR CONTRIBUTORS

Julie O'Brien

For providing our wonderful cover photography, photos throughout, and an interview. Also for always answering the many incessant questions we asked her about Dublin's Finest so helpfully, and for providing videos for our Instagram. To see more of Julie's work, visit her Instagram @pizza_egg.

Daniel Breslin

For providing an interview and allowing us to publish his poem in the magazine. To see more of Dylan's work visit @bres_o on Instagram.

House of Hibernia Team

Scheymon Dreymon, Keelin Coleman, and Nessa Sutcliffe for providing interviews. Kate Lawlor (@daisychainsphotos on Instagram) and Evan Cahill (@evancahill on Instagram) for allowing us to reproduce their photos.

Kenneth Hudson

For providing an interview. To see more of Kenneth's work visit @_kennethhudson on Instagram.

INDEX

The sources for the article “Ireland’s Dying Nightlife: The Hope of House of Hibernia” on pp.8-11:

Avetisjan, Helena . “Exploring the Decline of Nightlife and Changing Social Behaviors.” University Observer, 15 Sept. 2025, universityobserver.ie/exploring-the-decline-of-nightlife-and-changing-social-behaviors/. Accessed April 5th 2026.

Cetin, Marissa. “In-Depth Report on Irish Club Culture and Nightlife Industry Published by Give Us the Night.” DJ Mag, 1 July 2025, djmag.com/news/depth-report-irish-club-culture-and-nightlife-industry-published-give-us-night. Accessed April 5th 2026.

Copestake, Izzy . “There Are Only 83 Nightclubs Left in Ireland.” District Magazine, 15 Jan. 2025, districtmagazine.ie/news/there-are-only-83-nightclubs-left-in-ireland/?utm_. Accessed April 5th 2026.

Give Us The Night. The Rhythm of the Night: Report on Ireland’s Nightclub Industry and Dance Culture. Give Us The Night, 2025, www.giveusthenight.com/wp-content/uploads/2025/06/TheRhythmOfTheNight_Irish-Nightclub-Report_GiveUsTheNight_2025.pdf?utm_. Accessed April 5th 2026.

“Give Us the Night Launches Comprehensive Report on Ireland’s Nightclub Industry.” 909 Originals, June 2025, 909originals.com/2025/06/25/give-us-the-night-launches-comprehensive-report-on-irelands-nightclub-industry/. Accessed April 5th 2026.

“Ireland’s Nightclub Numbers down by 84% since 2000, New Study Reveals.” PLAYYY. Magazine, theplayground.co.uk/irelands-nightclub-numbers-down-by-84-since-2000-new-study-reveals/. Accessed April 5th 2026.

O’Donoghue, Rob. “Ireland’s Nightlife Suffers under Outdated Laws – O’Donoghue.” Labour, 25 June 2025, labour.ie/news/2025/06/25/irelands-nightlife-suffers-under-outdated-laws-odonoghue/?utm_. Accessed April 5th 2026.

Sheehy, Mairead . “Irish Nightclub Scene on “Brink of Collapse”, Say Campaigners .” Irish Examiner, 15 Jan. 2025, www.irishexaminer.com/news/arid-41554561.html?utm_. Accessed April 5th 2026.

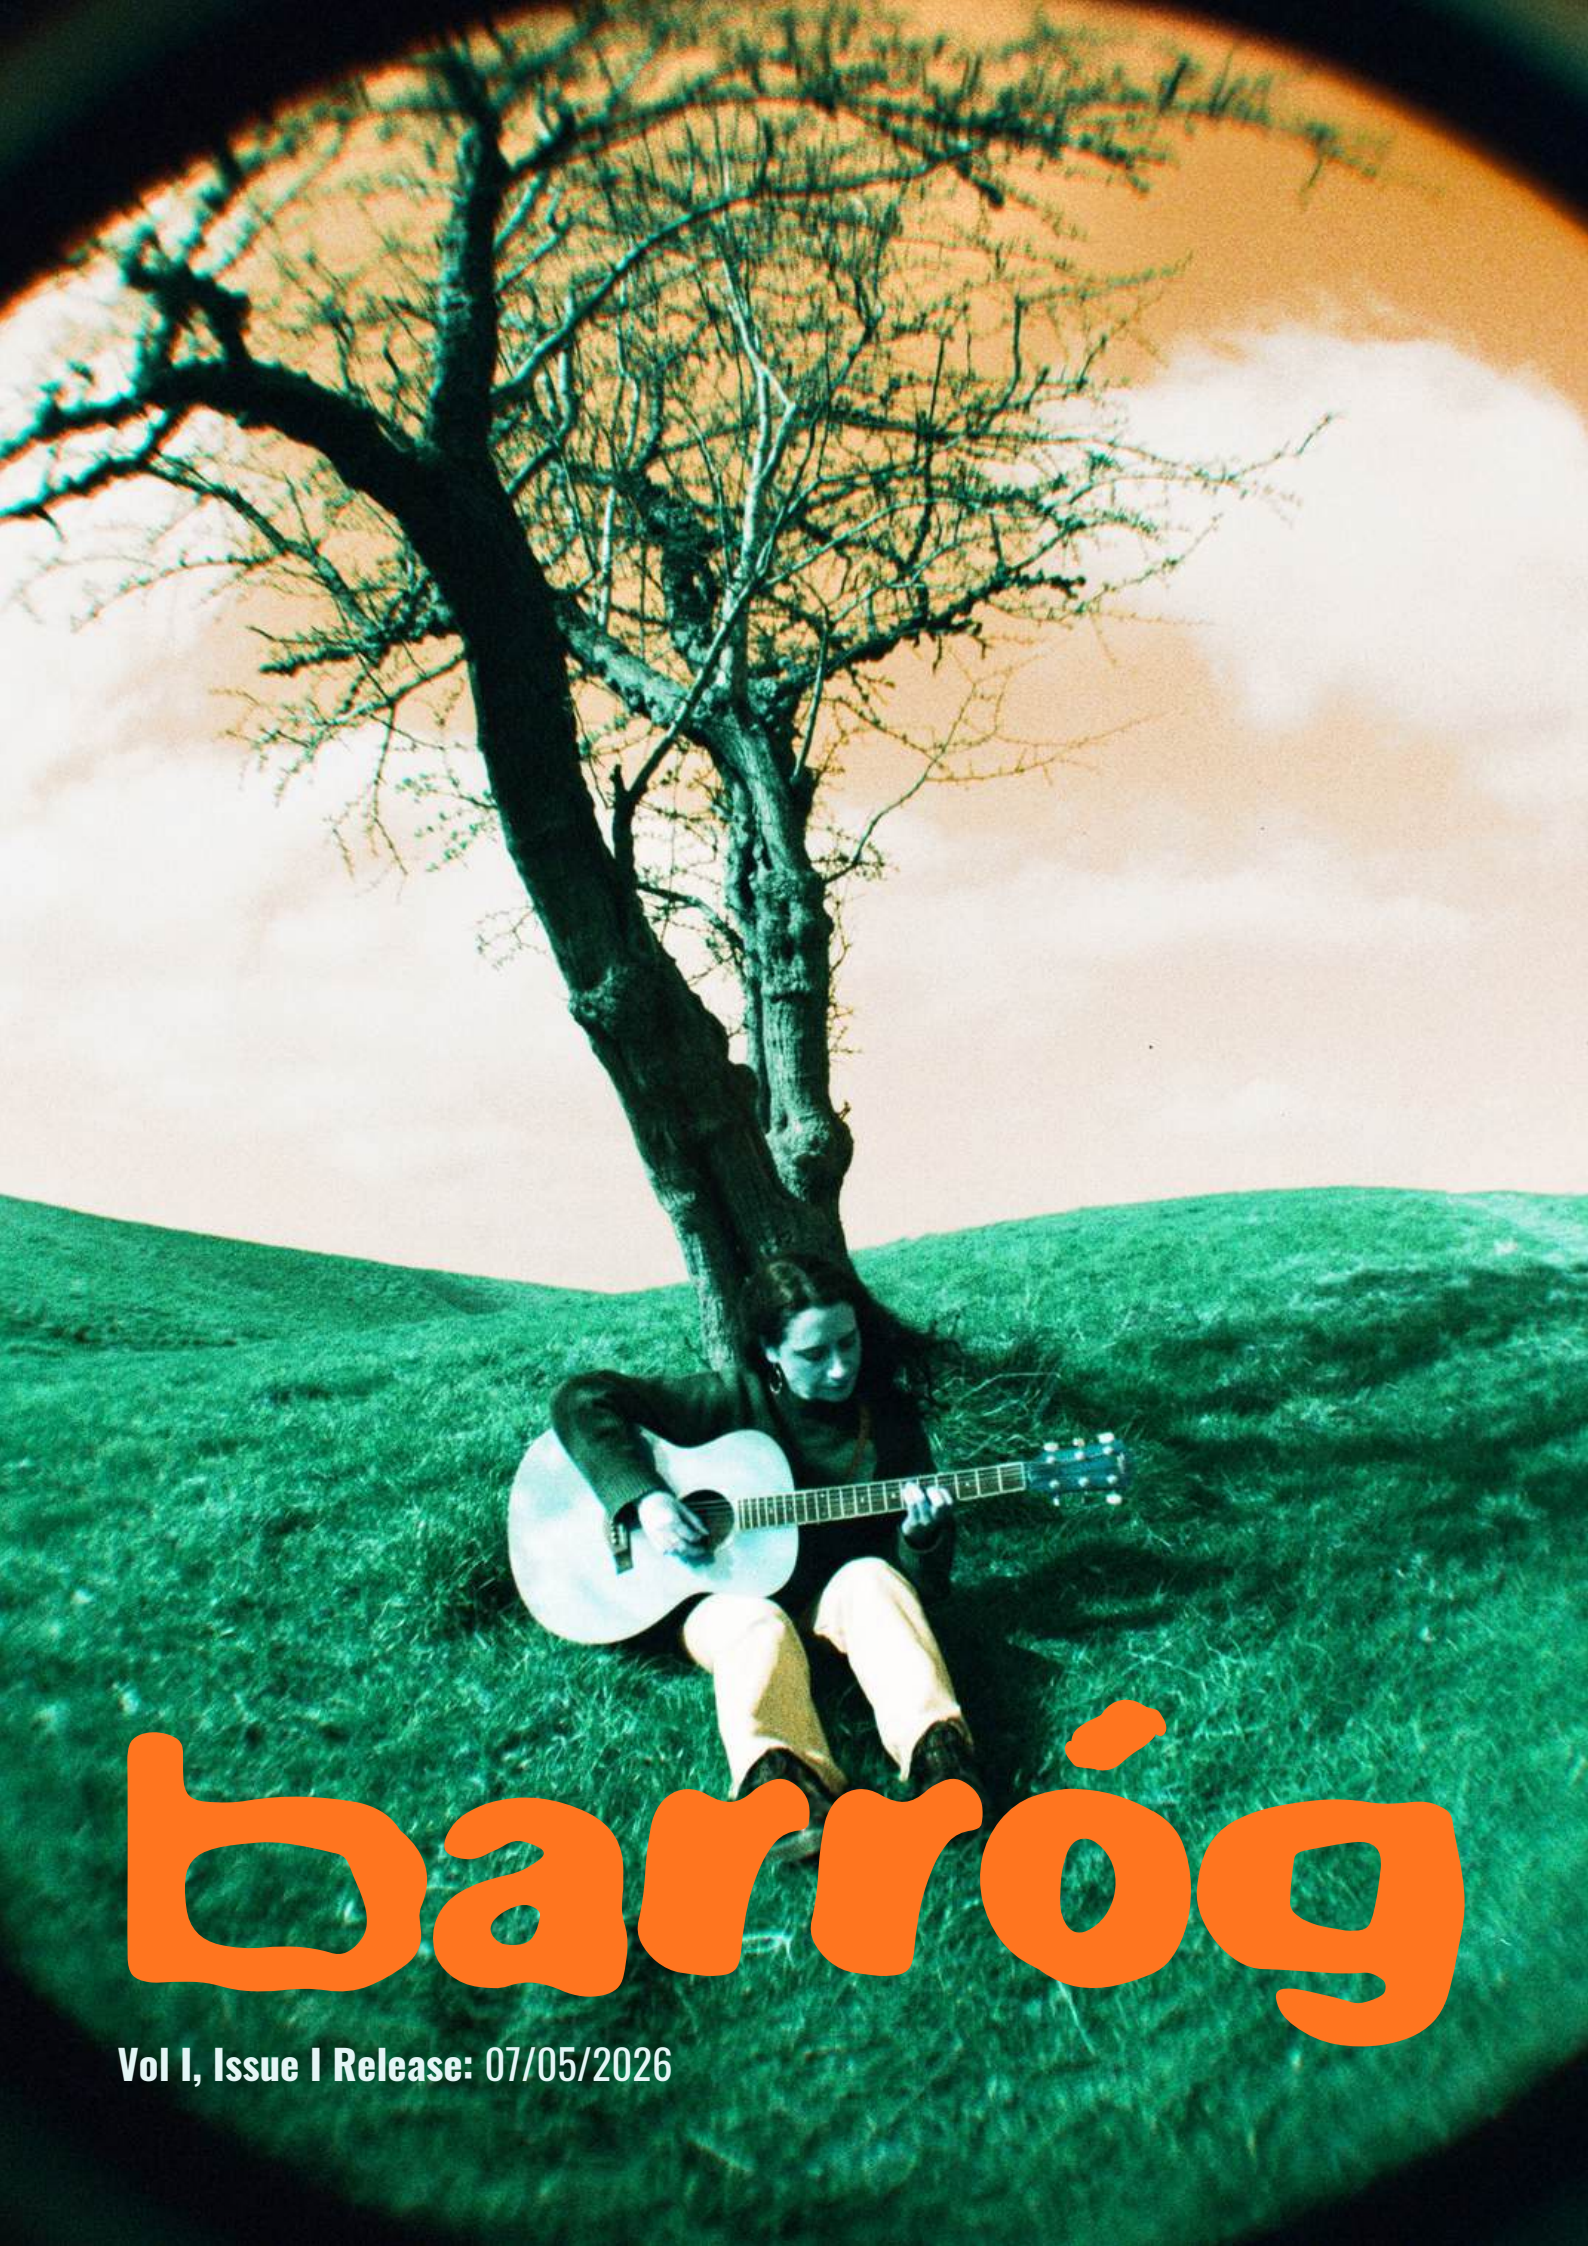

“Survey Finds Almost 80% of People Say Dublin Nightlife Is Worse than Other Countries.” Joe.ie, 2025, www.joe.ie/news/survey-finds-almost-80-of-people-say-dublin-nightlife-is-worse-than-other-countries-841351?utm_. Accessed April 5th 2026.

SUBMIT TO ISSUE #2

Barróg is always looking to expand the issues we cover and the variety of perspectives represented in these pages. If you are an artist of any kind, please get in touch with us via our Instagram (@barrog.mag) or email us at info@barrogmag.ie to express interest in writing for our next issue. The issue topic for issue #2 will be announced on our Instagram in the coming days, so keep an eye out there for all the information you need to write for us.

barróg

barróg

Vol I, Issue I Release: 07/05/2026